

The Importance of Touch: Caring for Young Children Who Have Experienced Trauma

Touch is essential to healthy development, yet for children who have been abused, it can prompt more anxiety than comfort. Children—particularly very young children—who have survived physical abuse may come to associate all human touch with pain, and may find it difficult to accept physical affection and comfort from their caregivers. Those who have experienced sexual abuse may not understand that touch doesn't have to be sexual.

It can take time for traumatized young children to accept—and give—touch in a way that is comforting, appropriate, and that reinforces their self-worth and self-esteem. It may take many, many small experiences of pleasure and safety to counteract the big experiences of trauma and pain they have endured. Below are some simple steps to take when caring for children who have difficulty with physical contact.

“Touch seems to be as essential as sunlight.”

- Be consistent and reliable in meeting the child's physical needs. Every time these needs are met—whether for food, a clean diaper, or getting back to sleep after waking—the child will begin to make new associations. The more you can anticipate the child's needs before he or she cries, the more the child will be able to “take in” the wonderful new experience of being cared for.
- Create a soothing environment. Because loud noises can be strong trauma reminders for babies and young children who have been physically abused, it's important to keep the environment as soothing as possible: soft music, soft light, and soft, calm voices. Potential trauma reminders such as an alarm clock going off or even a phone ringing should be avoided as much as possible.
- Avoid surprising the child. Sudden or unexpected contact is all the more scary for traumatized babies, so it's important to describe what you are doing before you do it: “I am going to change your diaper now” or “Here is your nice bottle.” Though babies may not understand what you are saying, they will be calmed by the sound of a voice that is soft and soothing. Babies have also been shown to respond well to soft “shushing” noises.
- Use texture and movement to soothe and calm. Babies who are very distressed by human touch may still be comforted by the sensation of soft fabrics or plush toys. Giving children plush blankets or stuffed animals to cuddle can help them to get used to pleasant sensations against their skin, which you can then build on. Babies are also comforted by gentle swinging motions. Babies who cannot tolerate touch may benefit from being in a baby swing or simply rocked gently in a cradle or carriage.

- Take it slow. When it comes to touch, the first step may be to just be present in the child's room, sitting by the crib, and singing or talking to the child in a soft, calm voice. It may take many days or weeks of such "being present" before the child can tolerate even a simple touch, such as a gentle stroke of the arm. If the child avoids eye contact, don't force it. Wait for the child to initiate eye contact, and reinforce the action with a smile and comforting words or sounds.

The more "tuned in" we become to children's nonverbal signals, the more we will be able to build on their positive responses. For example, if you notice that a baby seems to calm down when sucking on her hand, you may be able to offer comfort simply by helping her get her hand to her mouth.
